

Entering the Electronic Conversation

In Curriculum as Conversation: Transforming Traditions of Teaching and Learning (1996, Chicago: University of Chicago Press), Arthur Applebee argues that knowledge is something we develop and grasp through our actions. In particular, he believes that “conversation” is a critical medium for developing new understanding, especially when that conversation is embedded in historical ways of thinking and doing. We learn about particular ways of acting—whether learning investment strategies, calf-roping techniques, writing pedagogies, or other “knowledge-in-action”—through participation in ongoing conversations about things that matter, and doing so within traditions that structure particular ways of thinking. To Applebee, a school curriculum needs to be built around the development of culturally significant domains for conversation through which students may grasp appropriate conceptual knowledge.

Applebee’s argument applies to virtually any domain, any traditional way of thinking and acting: development comes through participation in cultural activity, with talk serving as an essential activity in most cultures. Yet, oddly enough, the domain of teaching often provides limited opportunities for participation in conversations that matter. Many teachers talk about being lonely and working in isolation, of closing the classroom door to shut out the distractions that interfere with student learning. If Applebee is right, then teachers as well as students ought to have opportunities to participate in conversations that matter to them, that serve their developmental needs.

USING LISTSERVS

One way I’ve found to involve myself in conversations that matter is through my participation in electronic mail listservs. A listserv is an electronic forum that allows any e-mail subscriber anywhere on the planet to join a conversation of mutual interest.

Here’s how it works: A large computer (for our purposes, usually one that serves a large university) sets up a listserv, which is a way of distributing the same message to a large group of people. Anyone who wants may “subscribe” to the listserv usually at no cost. A subscriber might send a message to the listserv; the listserv distributes it to all subscribers. Any subscriber can respond, which in turn gets distributed to the network. Conversations therefore spring up around whatever topics the subscribers feel are worth talking about.

I’ve found that listserv discussions are very valuable in my own work, allowing me to talk over ideas with people who can help me sharpen and direct my thinking. Most teachers I know who subscribe to networks have picked up teaching ideas, located resources, made friends, and otherwise expanded the radius of their networks to encompass the globe.

What follows is a list of listservs that I’ve collected from the Internet, organized by categories. I’ve only personally sampled a few and so can’t vouch for them firsthand; what you might do is try one or two and see if you like them. If not, you can unsubscribe and try a new one—as you’ll see there are plenty to choose from. And keep in mind that these are only educational lists. There are listserv discussions on about any topic, from gerbils to Generation X. For the master list, send a message to listserv@bitnic.bitnet and send a message consisting of a single word: global. But beware, this list of lists is enormous and will take a long time to download.

HOW TO SUBSCRIBE

To subscribe to a network you typically:

- a) send a message to: listserv@universityname.edu
- b) leave the subject line of your message blank
- c) in the body of your message, type:
subscribe listname Your Name

There are variations on this basic procedure as you’ll see. If you’re interested in subscribing to a list, follow the instructions given. If that doesn’t work, try one or more of the variations you’ll see in the following instructions.

When available, World Wide Web (WWW) sites are listed at the end of sections. These are not discussion lists, but home pages that you can visit using Netscape or other web browser software. The following are lists and subscription information.
